IT WAS the moment of truth for Thierry Henry - but he chickened out.

Armed with an eight-foot poster, the Sunday World ambushed the cheating French captain at his plush house in Barcelona yesterday.

We expected him to be a sport and sign a statement saying: "I'm sorry. I Thierry Henry, apologise to the Irish people for using my hand to knock them out of the World Cup finals".

But the disgraced soccer legend proved he was not just a cheat - but a coward as well. He had handled the ball, but he didn't have the balls to handle our protest on behalf of the nation despite revelations yesterday that he personally pocketed €431,000 in a qualification bonus by cheating. Henry and goalscorer William Gallas negotiated the windfall with French FA bosses provided they could qualify for South Africa.

Barmy
Their barmy manager Raymond Domenech made more than €800,000 from the shameful goal. Yesterday morning, as he prepared to go with his team Barcelona FC to play a La Liga game in Bilbao, the Sunday World finally came face to face with the man who spoiled our World Cup dream. Under the watchful eye of a security camera and a plain-clothes bodyguard, I hung around outside his sumptuous villa in the hills above Barcelona until he emerged. But, faced with the huge photo of himself and yours truly, all he could do was stare in horror as I politely asked him to sign the poster to prove he meant his earlier self-serving "apology". After a moment's pause, he backed off and, in a shaky voice, said "Hi, how are you?" in Spanish to his bodyguard who had been watching me outside the house for an hour. Then Ireland's public enemy number one got into his Audi SUV and zoomed away to catch the team bus at the stadium.

Infamous
Everywhere he went in Barcelona this weekend our protest poster man marked him and made headlines at home and abroad. Our campaign received coverage from Ireland to India and soccer fans around the world contacted us on Facebook to show their approval. On Friday, I tried to get Henry to sign our poster as he left his club's
